

DPN Announces New Director of Member Services

Emily Gore, Director of Member Services

The Digital Preservation Network (DPN) has hired Emily Gore to fulfill a new Director of Member Services position. This new position will further prioritize DPN's commitment to members and expand the consultation, services, and content provided to all within the digital preservation community.

Mary Molinaro, DPN's Executive Director, is thrilled about this new appointment and commented "The addition of Emily to our team is a tremendous benefit to our members. Her extensive expertise with digital collection collaborations and working among cultural heritage institutions will be a direct benefit to each member. We are excited that she will be focused on understanding member needs and providing tangible tools and services to foster efficient, cost-effective, and scalable preservation solutions."

Emily was previously the Director for Content at the Digital Public Library of America \(DPLA\), where she provided a strategic vision for content and metadata, coordinated content and collections workflows, and developed and oversaw the DPLA Hubs network. Before joining DPLA, she served as Associate Dean for Digital Scholarship and Technology at Florida State University Libraries. Emily has served as a MetaArchive Cooperative Steering Committee member and has taught, presented and published in the field of digital preservation management.

"I am excited about this new position and look forward to providing members with tools and services that will help ensure success for their digital preservation needs."

- EMILY GORE

Emily currently serves as a founding steering committee member of RightsStatements.org, an international collaborative providing standardized rights statements for cultural heritage institutions. She has an MLIS from the University of Alabama, a BA from Clemson University and is a 2011 graduate of the Frye Leadership Institute.
